The U.S. economy in June barely grew at all, expanding at only a 1.1 percent annual rate, the Commerce Department said on Friday. It was the first time since 2004 that growth was below 2 percent, which has traditionally been viewed as the level of expansion that is consistent with full employment. Economists had expected growth of 1.5 percent to 2 percent for the month. Economists said the disappointing figure reflected a lackluster job market, with employers struggling to find qualified workers, and a relatively disappointing amount of business investment. The economy has been struggling to build on its initial boost from tax cuts. It also pointed to a slightly slowing global economy, a continuing drag on the American economy that intensified earlier this year. It released a weaker-than-expected reading for the second quarter of 2019, also hitting a 1.
