If EA Sports are serious about not only creating a better game but changing the way we play too, then it was more than a little jarring to see that the footage they used to show off the game's new innovations did nothing to play as any other game of football I'd played in years. It was like watching a car crash. So how did they do it? The video shows off a number of new features that will be built into the game at launch. The first of these, for example, is the introduction of a "cinematic" camera mode. Previously in the game, gameplay action was seen from the very top of the player's head, with a generic football that didn't really feel like a football at all. With the cinematic camera mode, you now get a view of the players from the ground-level or from the side. This gives you a much better and more immersive overview of what's going on in the game and where you need to focus your attention. It was immediately obvious that from this vantage point we're not being shown the top player view on a FIFA game, but instead a real-world view of a match in motion. What's more, you're able to change the angle you're viewing the action from, and even zoom into smaller elements of the match. If those are the new camera modes, how do we play the game itself? That's where the video shows footage of "HyperMotion", which is the key change to the game. The "HyperMotion" engine is all about a series of physical attributes that players possess during a game. These include quick acceleration and deceleration, tight, agile turning and ducking, and full back-heel, front-heel and turn-over. All of these traits are underpinned by the player's head, leg and arm movements, as they perform a play. As well as this, of course, the game continues to feature the same core elements of the game - passing, dribbling, heading, shooting, tackles, dribble animation and more. For the most part, these core gameplay systems remain the same, but EA Sports have been able to improve them in a number of areas thanks to the use of data from "HyperMotion". Teams have been given a number of different attributes to take into a

Unplayable Levels Lead to FIFA Review Ban in Europe Planned Early Access Release Leaves EA FIFA Player in the Dark About New Content FIFA has been pulled from the ratings by the ESRB following incidents with the game in which unplayable levels emerged last month. EA has promised to provide an early access release of the game on the PS4, Xbox One and PC - but not the release date. The PS4 version is already rated by the ESRB for a Mature rating, but the Xbox One and PC versions are still in the process of being rated. In an email to Eurogamer from EA, they said the process to release the next-gen versions of the game had been delayed so that unplayable levels could be dealt with first: "We are delaying the game to make sure we have the correct solutions on the PS4 and Xbox One in time for release," the company said. EA also asked players to please be patient for the rating of the PC version, as it's still a work in progress and cannot yet be presented to the ESRB. The ESRB had to pull FIFA from the PlayStation 4, Xbox One and PC ratings, as there are unplayable levels that have not been addressed. The ESRB added an advisory to the ratings saying that the FIFA release contains content that is "generally intended for audiences 18 years of age and older". They also added: "In the USA, this content may be rated M for Mature." Speaking about FIFA in a recent interview, EA Sports senior creative director Peter Moore said a few problems had bc9d6d6daa
