When I was little my family always went camping at the beginning of summer. My brother and I loved it, yet in the end it all turned out to be way more trouble than it was worth. We found ourselves in quite a predicament - there were only two toilets and, when it is time to pee, I am quite some way away from the toilet. My mother usually intervened to help in such situations, but it was a trial and error method; sometimes she would get it right, sometimes not. When we got to a certain campground, there were no toilets, or at least very few. However, there was a brook nearby, one of those brooks with a big moss that covers its bed, so you could easily use the moss as a toilet. This was the moment we came up with the best solution we could think of. We would sit in the moss and pee into the brook, then let the brook go through the moss, through the ground, so the whole campground would know we were using it. This way, we thought, we could avoid having to walk too far just to find a toilet. This solution worked for the first day or two, but after that, we ran out of moss and, since my mother wasn't in the mood to do it again for us, we had to travel back. I still remember that day. The sun

Metformin exposure in the neonate and infant. Metformin is currently used in the treatment of type 2 diabetes in adolescents and young adults, and its use is steadily rising. Despite its increasing use, there is little to no evidence of its safety and efficacy in pregnancy, resulting in only limited data available in the pediatric population. Regarding the safety of metformin in the fetus and infant, a preponderance of the available data, including 1 randomized, controlled trial, suggest that metformin may be neither teratogenic nor toxic in the fetus and, in fact, may be beneficial for maternal diabetes, neonatal hypoglycemia, and cardiovascular outcomes. However, metformin is difficult to detect in neonates using routine newborn screening. This article describes the main pharmacological and metabolic actions of metformin, focusing on information related to the quantification of metformin exposure in the developing neonate. Several clinical trials performed in children with type 2 diabetes have shown that metformin improves glycemic control, lowers insulin needs, and does not decrease body weight or alter lipid profiles. Metformin is cheap, easy to administer, and has few adverse effects, making it one of the first-line drugs used in the treatment of children with type 2 diabetes who have insufficient glycemic control with other antidiabetic medications. Metformin's safety in pregnancy, the infant, and the neonate is scarce, and thus well-designed randomized controlled trials are still needed.Q: How to make globally available self-referencing attributes with a4j:attributeTag? I'm new to a4j:attributeTag and I've been doing some reading and saw that you can wrap the attributes of a component into components of their own. Based on a few examples, I've noticed that there's a self-reference attribute (an attribute key with a value of this). In all examples
