The opening of the 1A Interdisciplinary Studies Building at the University of Texas at Dallas, the culmination of a multiyear project, is a testament to new partnerships and technology being adopted in the academy. The new building (image above), which houses the Chemistry, Physics and Mathematics Departments, was built in three phases, with an $18 million price tag. The first phase focused on the north end of the building and the $11 million addition of the Modern Physics-Neuroscience Research Institute. With funding from the Texas Higher Education Coordinating Board, the University of Texas System, City of Dallas, the U.S. Department of Education and the North Central Texas Council of Governments, the new building is 19 percent larger than the previous one. It's also more energy efficient, with improved air quality and better daylighting. The addition consisted of eight new labs. In previous years, these labs were in "lobes" that could be blocked off during the academic year. Now the labs are dispersed throughout the building. "I think they're a great addition," said Randy Behnke, professor of physics at the University of Texas at Dallas and director of the Texas Advanced Computing Center. "They should be valuable to the students. The idea is to have a sense of environment in which you can be productive." The construction of the new building started in 2010, according to the U.S. Department of Education. It's one of a handful of projects funded by the DOE's Advanced Research Projects Agency for the Advancement of Science (ARPA-AS). "With the advent of the common Core Curriculum, we now have a large number of students in the classroom, working in their collaborative mode," said Ryan Garfin, associate professor of physics. "These 'lab-in-a-box' labs offer students opportunities for hands-on learning." When the building was completed, the "typical" lab provided a 24 percent saving over a traditional lab and 27 percent over a large lecture hall. "The lab was extensively designed to maximize the use of space, with the idea that the lab could be used for a variety of activities
