Long-term teratogenic effects of mutagenic/carcinogenic impurities in edible oil. Mutagenicity and carcinogenicity of oil at different stages of extraction were studied. Fat extracted from krill oil was found to contain most of the mutagenicity and carcinogenicity associated with this oil. The mutagenicity and carcinogenicity of the fat obtained from three different chemocatalogonic extraction methods, in each case using isopropyl ether as solvent, was compared. The mutagenicity of the fat was a function of its acid value, as the mutagenicity of the fat was high when the acid value was less than 70, but low when the acid value was higher. The carcinogenicity of the fat was high when the mutagenicity was high. This oil, as well as the oil extracted by the first two methods, was found to be mutagenic in the microsome test using male mice. On the other hand, the oil extracted by the third method was not mutagenic in the same test. The mutagenicity of the oil was also tested by sister chromatid exchange technique. No sister chromatid exchange was observed in the cells of the bone-marrow and in those of blood leucocytes, whereas, a very high level of sister chromatid exchange was observed in the cells of the liver. It appears that the
