When Alan Turing first conceived of the Turing Test in 1947, he suggested that a computer programs resemblance to a human mind could be gauged by making it answer a series of questions written by an interrogator in another room. Jump forward about seven decades, and Google says its now developed a Turing Test that can spot a bot by requiring it to do something far simpler: Click on a checkbox. When enabled in your survey options, Prevent multiple submissions allows you to detect duplicates and keep them from making their way through the survey. During the first survey session, Prevent multiple submissions places a cookie on the browser.

After a user has started a survey, you will be able to automatically set the majority of the Question Options for that survey. For example, if you set the Gender option to Man and the age range to Over 18, when the survey is distributed, the gender and age range questions will automatically display Male and Over 18 respectively.

Automatically setting the majority of Question Options can drastically decrease the complexity of survey creation and save you time. When you initially build your survey, you only have the option of setting a single Question Option. Other Question Options will only appear in the “Edit Survey Options” mode. All of the Question Options you created before can be used in any survey as well as each User Profile. However, if a user is multi-selecting, all of the Question Options of that select are automatically added to that User Profile.

The creation of this bot won't require any Coding. You simply need to build a machine that can gather information and does that specific thing on the QA server.

Once you have the bot ready, test its capabilities. Because this is a QA bot, you don't want to submit it to a production server. Use a test or staging server to test the bot. Once you run into trouble, you'll need to turn your bot back on its creator and get him/her to fix it. The creator will tell you what has been changed and why.

Once he/she has it ironed out, ask the creator to remove it and have your bot re-implement. The code for this bot is pretty basic. It is meant to answer the first question that you ask it. In this case, it's an easy question, but it could be more complex. For example, you could ask it to submit an application for a job opening or to compare two products. The system requires very little from the bot to run.
